

VOTED OUT OF THE ELECTION

Marty Funcell

6/19/08

Reality shows are still very prevalent on TV. There are basically three types of reality shows.

One type is where there is a contest of some sort. You can get voted off the island, get voted out of the house, get voted off the singing contest, get voted off the dance contest and so on. Game shows also fall into this category.

The second type is where you watch how other people live. We were able to watch Ozzy Osborn mumble and yell "SHARON!", or we could watch Hulk Hogan hulk, or we could watch the late Anna Nicole Smith eat in bed.

The third type of reality show is where we get to watch people work on shows like "Cops", "American Chopper", and "Dog – the Bounty Hunter". Americans love to watch other people work.

In this election year, I think they should combine the reality shows with politics. I want to watch the candidates debate and answer questions from a panel of British judges consisting of Simon Cowell, Piers Morgan, and Nigel Lythgoe.

I want to watch the candidates in their home private life. I want to see if the candidates can manage their own household and see who does the vacuuming.

I want to watch the candidates work. Aren't you curious to observe their delegation style and decision making process?

But most of all, I want to be able to call an 800 number and vote for the candidate I like to determine who will be the last comic standing... I mean the last politician standing.